U.S. and Mexico recognize the end of a scourge

Smallpox infection in the United States and Mexico has been virtually a concern of the past for 16 years. It was in 1951 that both countries saw the disappearance of the disease; Mexico had been the chief source of infection for its neighbor to the north.

Now in recognition of victory, smallpox vaccination certificates for travelers between Mexico and the United States are no longer required.

In an accord reached by U.S. Surgeon General William Stewart and the Mexican Secretary of Health Rafael Moreno Valle, during a recent annual meeting of the U.S.-Mexican Border Public Health Association, it was agreed that the number of smallpox cases in both countries is at such low levels, continuance of the vaccination policy is no longer necessary.

Abolishment of the smallpox vaccination requirement for citizens visiting either country has been hailed in Mexico as vindication of Federal health campaigns.

The certificate will still be required from citizens of other nations visiting either Mexico or the United States, Dr. Valle said.

It is only a matter of time when Central American travel also will no longer require an exchange of smallpox vaccination certificates, inasmuch as the infection has also been wiped out there, according to International Health Division officials of the U.S. Public Health Service. Canada for years has required no exchange of certificates because of the decline of the disease on U.S. northern borders.

Along with the smallpox accord, Mexico and the United States have agreed to step up activities along the 1877-mile border to protect public health, with special concentration on exchange of information on tuberculosis and venereal diseases, easily transmittable in border towns with heavy daily crossing and recrossing of the frontier.

An antirabies drive is also to be vigorously launched, and Mexican and American technicians are engaged in a census of border industries to determine their influence on air pollution, and to take corrective measures if necessary. The latter problem may become more aggravated due to recent policy of American firms setting up plants across the border, to take advantage of cheaper labor.
