What is Aerobics? Basically it is exercising steadily at 3/4 of your heart's working capacity. When you exercise so hard that you must gasp for breath, your heart is exceeding 3/4 of its capacity. But when you are exercising just below that level, raising your pulse but not losing your breath, you are exercising aerobically. chance of heart disease. Aerobically trained people lose weight and burn calories easier. They have more energy and endurance, and handle stress with greater ease. Also, these changes create a feeling of emotional well being that is hard to attain any other way.

What is Isokinetics? While "Aerobic" describes the rate of body exercise, "Isokinetic" refers to the degree of resistance your muscles work against when you exert them. WORKOUT®, and other ultramodern training equipment, is carefully designed to offer approximately the same resistance at the beginning, middle and end of each exercise. The biggest news in exercise today is that Isokinetic training makes muscles stronger and more agile than weight-lifting, which exercises muscles improperly by providing uncomfortable uneven resistance.
