Bubble basket

We thought you might appreciate that the unusual bubble discovered by Hoffman and Meeks ("Three Bites in a Doughnut," SN: 3/16/85, p.168) has now actually been constructed (see photo).

An associate of mine, Robert R. Weekley, became intrigued after recently coming across Ivars Peterson's article, and constructed a "basket"

that guides the bubble
into the desired shape when dipped in a solution. It is absolutely mesmerizing in real life.

We are working on a "dissolving frame"
and a permanent bubble material, so that after dipping and drying you have just three hoops and pure bubble. If one of your readers has the "solution" we would appreciate hearing from them.

Stress vs. smoke

The researchers cited in "Less colitis among smokers" (SN: 4/4/87, p.213) need to consider the psychological rather than only the biological implications of their study.

They say there are "currently no plausible biologic explanations" for the apparent "protective" effect of cigarette smoking on ulcerative colitis. Can it be that those people who quit smoking did not develop other ways of dealing with stress and so developed ulcerative colitis? It is almost too obvious to say that smokers don't develop ulcerative colitis but die of lung cancer instead.
