Journal of Consciousness Studies

controversies in science & the humanities

A new refereed multi-disciplinary journal

Over the last few years research into consciousness has at last become accepted within the academic community. As John Searle puts it, raising the subject of consciousness in cognitive science discussions is no longer considered to be 'bad taste', causing graduate students to 'roll their eyes at the ceiling and assume expressions of mild disgust.'

JCS is a new scholarly journal which combines the insights of science and the humanities into this new field of research, and all presented in plain accessible English.

The first issue includes interviews with Francis Crick and Roger Penrose (previewing his new book), presenting two very different models of consciousness.

Peer-reviewed articles include A Testable Field Theory of Mind-Brain Interaction by eminent physiologist Ben Libet, articles on quantum-mechanical theories of consciousness by Stuart Hameroff and Chris Nunn, and a philosophical critique of the neural reductionism by Valerie Hardcastle. Issue 2 will include Consciousness Research Abstracts.

This important and highly entertaining reference book presents the popular lore, social history, and practical uses of nearly 700 native wildflowers. These are plants that have been used as foods, medicines, cosmetics, poisons, dyes, or fibers, from pre-Colonial times to our own day. They are also the plants that are currently undergoing a revival in American gardens.

Illustrated with 350 nineteenth-century botanical drawings, the book is both a browser's delight and an important contribution to the growing field of ethnobotany. Special attention is paid to Native American traditions.

The History and Folklore of North American Wildflowers will be welcomed by nature lovers, serious botanists, students of American history and culture, and weekend gardeners.
